The Gallatin master's program is designed with you in mind.

It's interdisciplinary. Select classes from most schools and divisions of New York University.

It's tailored to individual goals. Put together the curriculum you want.

It's career-oriented. Use an internship to get on-the-job experience in the career of your choice or to sample various work settings.

and much, much more . . .

Candidates for the master's degree are assured of academic quality within a context of innovation, experimentation, and self-motivation.

Special features of the Gallatin master's degree program include:

An interdisciplinary curriculum allows the student to combine courses from several fields—business, psychology, and arts administration, for example—in order to develop an individual specialty that gives him or her something unique to offer as a professional.

Independent study opportunities range from original research to marketing projects to arts classes.

Internships are available in the arts, social services, business, and many other fields for firsthand career experience.

Personal advisement is offered by faculty advisers who work closely with each student on curriculum development.

Life experience/proficiency credit is available free of charge to those who can document mastery of material comparable to that covered in specific courses at New York University.

New Directions for Women is a special program of career counseling and support systems for women in the Gallatin Division.

Forums in public policy, creative writing, and the visual arts are sponsored regularly by Gallatin and offer a chance for students to hear leading artists, writers, and public figures.

The required master's thesis may be shaped as a scholarly research project, a creative work, or a performance project.

Flexibility in scheduling means that students can fit their course work into a full- or part-time work schedule or around family commitments.
