Discover why so many women choose the Gallatin Division

New Directions for Women: Undergraduate and graduate education and career development for today's woman
Today's woman truly has a wide range of career opportunities available to her, but to take advantage of them she often needs to acquire the knowledge and practical experience that contribute to fulfillment and success in a career.

If you are beginning a career, want to advance in a career, or change careers, or if you are returning to school and intend to reenter the job market, the Gallatin Division of New York University's approach to higher education and career development is designed to help you take advantage of these opportunities.

New Directions for Women fully integrates a high-quality degree program, on either the undergraduate or graduate level, with practical career training and a comprehensive network of support for women with commitments to a job, family, and community in addition to educational and career goals. New Directions for Women features:

- classes conveniently scheduled during the day, evening, and on weekends that may be selected from most schools and divisions of the University
- an opportunity to create an individualized program of academic study on either the undergraduate or graduate level
- internships, independent study, and credit for life experience
- an optional women's studies component
- career counseling sessions
- a series of workshops focusing on the special concerns of women in such areas as health and financial management

How New Directions Works

The key to the success of the New Directions approach is individual advisement. Advisement at Gallatin departs from the traditional adviser-student relationship in being both personalized and ongoing. You are assigned an adviser based on your area of interest. This adviser helps plan and oversee your academic program while monitoring your progress toward a degree. Your adviser assists with independent study projects and internships as well as offering special expertise in your particular area of interest.

Degree Programs You Design with Your Adviser

The Gallatin Division offers undergraduate and graduate programs leading to degrees in individualized study. The undergraduate program gives you the opportunity to design a program specially tailored to your academic growth and career goals. Special emphasis is put on independent study and internship experiences that contribute to your professional growth.

The high-quality master's degree program allows you to pursue in-depth research, expertise in an area of career interest, or creative mastery. You may choose to defend a
You Can Choose Special Options and Features

We believe a truly comprehensive, well-rounded learning experience for women should include the following:

- Support network. To enable you to share your education, experience, and goals with other women who are pursuing individualized courses of study, workshops and informal discussion groups are held regularly on such topics as career options for mature women, women’s health, women and financial management, role definition, and how women react to and handle success.

- Career counseling. To provide you with skills necessary to seek out appropriate careers and to establish an appropriate work identity, Gallatin offers a series of seminars conducted by a leading expert in the field of career counseling for women. The counselor is available for individual consultations and for group work.

- Internships. Gallatin arranges for you to prepare for a career or work on research issues in a wide range of fields, including arts administration, business, health, education, law, journalism, rehabilitation, television, and theatre.

- Life experience credits. You may have spent years in a pursuit that has provided knowledge equivalent to that covered in specific University courses. If so, you may be eligible to receive academic credit for your experience.

- Choice of curriculum models. If you choose to do a more concentrated program, you have the option of developing a curriculum model in several specific areas as part of your individualized program. These include, but are not restricted to: women’s studies, art and humanities, experiential learning, and arts management. Adviser assignment and the outlined curriculum (specific course work, internships, and independent studies) will all focus on enabling you to gain expertise in your chosen area of study.

If you would like to discuss how New Directions for Women can work for you, write or call to set up an appointment with an adviser. A Gallatin adviser will be happy to speak with you about academic programs, admissions requirements, and how your educational background and employment experience may be related to your current educational and career goals.

If you have any questions about New Directions for Women, direct them to the Gallatin Division, New York University, 715 Broadway, 6th Floor, New York, N.Y. 10003; (212) 598-7077. As of spring 1987, (212) 998-7370.
In 1831, Albert Gallatin, one of the founders of New York University, called for a new approach to higher education. Instead of offering a narrow Greek and Latin curriculum, the university would be located in an urban center and its curriculum would be wide in range and relevant to the concerns of its urban citizens.

Today, Gallatin's boldly innovative approach is nowhere better exemplified at New York University than in the division that bears his name. Flexibility and innovation in program design and the recognition in certain students of the quality of resourcefulness are the key factors in the superior higher educational experience offered by the Gallatin Division.